"The necessity for constant change of system, to avoid detection, drives them to invent new tricks so often that it is difficult to keep track of them. One of the latest, and the most novel, I happened to hear of just a few days ago. A beautiful girl sought employment in a down-town business establishment run by father and son. Well, she contrived to entangle them both and get up an escapade with the son, which in the end cost him a tidy sum the testimony of officers of the German to settle. The romantic fool, believ-Imperial Navy, like Admirals Von ing he had got a real treasure in his 'darling Edith,' would make little excursions around New York in her company. Of course. Romeo was only too glad to disgorge liberally on the spot.

"A new and rather neat trick to entrap is for a pretty blackmailer to enter a store where there are a great many clerks and salesmen. Well, once in the store she plies all her feminine arts upon her chosen prey (usually some one occupying a good remunerative position, and whose circumstances she has learned something about,) and, engaging him in conversation, lets slip some stray remark which she emphasizes with her eyes. A visit or two, possibly a theater or opera night, and some fine day my lady sails into the store like a Spanish frigate bent on plunder. A hurried talk follows: the man looks glum, but hands to the ensnarer the money she has demanded. Lonce knew of the case of a wellknown editor in this city who was taken in by a blackmailer. She was a little widow from Jersey City, and she called upon him one day with a woeful expression on her pretty girlish face that won his heart. By and by she dropped him a note, and he foolishly answered it. Then she got, as a favor, sies. These were invariably accompaly worded little note from the editor.

MRS. FRANK LESLIE. Her Forthcoming Marriage with the Marquis de Leuville.

Frank Leslie, the charming young widow of the great publisher whose name she bears and whose property she controls, was visited the other day by a reporter at her office in Park place with a view to learning what arrangements she is making for the forthcoming marriage with the Marquis de Lezville. It will be remembered that the engagement was publicly announced some months ago. When the reporter entered Mrs. Leslie was sitting at her desk, which was piled up with papers, letters, proofs, and general mercantile bric-a-brac. She was attired in a closefitting costume of black silk; gems rep resenting respectable fortunes glisten

ed in her ears and on her fingers. "I can not tell just upon what date our marriage is to take place," she said. "I must bide my time until the condition of my business here assumes such shape as to permit the changes which would naturally follow such a

While I am not as yet decided as to the exact date of our marriage, I may say that it will occur within a very few months.

"Will the Marquis de Leuville assume any part in the control of your business? "He will not. He is not a business man, and would probably make a bad mess of mercantile affairs. He is an artist and a poet. He is the author of works in three different languages-French, English, and Italian-and these he speaks so perfectly that you could not discover his nationality from his accent. He is, besides, a fine painter, and has sent several of his sketches to the Boston art exposition. He is also a good musician, but even with all these accomplishments he has no aptitude for business affairs." "Are you contemplating an elabor ate wedding reception?" the reporter asked. "Well, I presume we shall probably have a fine churc' wedding. Mrs. Leslie handed the reporter a letter, which she had received from Mgr. Capel, conveying his hearty good wishes for her future, and congratulating her upon her good fortune in securing so eligible a husband. Mgr. Capel and the Marquis de Leuville were intimate friends in Paris, and it was there that Mrs. Leslie met the eminent divine last year, through the introduction of the marquis. She was asked by the reporter what her programme was with regard to the wedding tour.

"I have made none," she replied. "I shall probably take a house in this city and continue in control of my business. In the fall I shall go on a trip of combined business and pleasure to California. I shall take with me some of my artists, and will of course be accompanied by the marquis. In December I go to New Orleans. During my

Referring to her congratulatory letter from Mgr. Capel, she said, laughing: "Just suppose this kind letter was the initiatory step in a movement on his part to convert me. Wouldn't it be funny?"
